SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR

For Dyspepsia, Costiveness, Sick Headache, Chronic Diarrhœa, Jaundice, Impurity of the Blood, Fever and Ague, Malaria, and all Diseases caused by Derangement of Liver, Bowels and Kidneys.

SYMPTOMS OF A DISEASED LIVER.

Bad Breath; Pain in the Side, sometimes the pain is felt under the Shoulder-blade, mistaken for Rheumatism; general loss of appetite; Bowels generally costive, sometimes alternating with lax; the head is troubled with pain, is dull and heavy, with considerable loss of memory, accompanied with a painful sensation of leaving undone something which ought to have been done; a slight, dry cough and flushed face is sometimes an attendant, often mistaken for consumption; the patient complains of weariness and debility; nervous, easily startled; feet cold or burning, sometimes a prickly sensation of the skin exists; spirits are low and despondent, and, although satisfied that exercise would be beneficial, yet one can hardly summon up fortitude to try it—in fact, distrusts every remedy. Several of the above symptoms attend the disease, but cases have occurred when but few of them existed, yet examination after death has shown the Liver to have been extensively deranged.

It should be used by all persons, old and young, whenever any of the above symptoms appear.

Persons Traveling or Living in Unhealthy Localities, by taking a dose occasionally to keep the Liver in healthy action, will avoid all Malaria, Bilious attacks, Dizziness, Nausea, Drowsiness, Depression of Spirits, etc. It will invigorate like a glass of wine, but is no intoxicating beverage.

If You have eaten anything hard of digestion, or feel heavy after meals, or sleepless at night, take a dose and you will be relieved.

Time and Doctors' Bills will be saved by always keeping the Regulator in the House!

For, whatever the ailment may be, a thoroughly safe purgative, alterative and tonic can never be out of place. The remedy is harmless and does not interfere with business or pleasure.

IT IS PURELY VEGETABLE,

And has all the power and efficacy of Calomel or Quinine, without any of the injurious after effects.

A Governor's Testimony.

Simmons Liver Regulator has been in use in my family for some time, and I am satisfied it is a valuable addition to the medical science.
J. GILL SHORTER, Governor of Ala.

Hon. Alexander H. Stephens, of Ga., says: Have derived some benefit from the use of Simmons Liver Regulator, and wish to give it a further trial.

"The only Thing that never fails to Relieve."—I have used many remedies for Dyspepsia, Liver Affection and Debility, but never have found anything to benefit me to the extent Simmons Liver Regulator has. I sent from Minnesota to Georgia for it, and would send further for such a medicine, and would advise all who are similarly affected to give it a trial as it seems the only thing that never fails to relieve.
P. M. JANNEY, Minneapolis, Minn.

Dr. T. W. Mason says: From actual experience in the use of Simmons Liver Regulator in my practice I have been and am satisfied to use and prescribe it as a purgative medicine.

SELECT STORY.

"FOR PITY'S SAKE."

BY H. J.

CHAPTER I.

It was in the year 1879 that Russian society, from the Imperial Court to the lowliest peasant, was thrown into a state of alarm and horror at the outrages perpetrated by the Nihilists.

Large blocks of ice were being removed from the Neva, as the cold season had begun to break.

Snow in the most regular and beautiful crystals fell gently on the garments of the pedestrians, and upon a handsome sledge which was conveying two ladies to the Royal Theatre at St. Petersburg.

A few minutes' drive and they arrived at their destination.

They were both English, and were stars in their profession.

Mlle Olga Marchmont came tripping off the stage into the green room to look for her friend, and, as she entered, all eyes were turned toward her in admiration; and well they might, for she was a fair picture to behold, and was quickly surrounded by the crowd of nobles and courtiers that usually haunted the theatre.

Her talk was like herself; she was the fine lady of old comedy, on and off the boards, witty, brilliant and superficial.

At the other end of the room sat her friend, Mlle. Evelyn Chatteris, and she presented a striking contrast to the radiant Olga.

She was about 18, with large, wistful, hazel eyes, with a beautiful mouth.

She was attired in a simple blue stuff dress, unadorned, except for two cherry-colored bows in her mob cap, and kerchief of clear muslin, which covered but did not conceal the dazzling whiteness of her neck and shoulders.

By her side was a grave but handsome Russian noble, Prince Saltakoff, a powerful and leading member of the government, and a great favorite of the emperor's

A lovely blush suffused Evelyn's face, that made her for the moment even more beautiful than Olga Marchmont, her stage rival, and dearest friend in real life.

"I have not seen you for two days, mademoiselle," said the prince; "this trial of the Nihilists is a weary one, and a sad one, too."

"Must they die?" and her sweet eyes looked earnestly up to his. "It seems very pitiful," she said, sorrowfully.

"No, mademoiselle," he replied, "they will not all be condemned to death; some of them will be banished to Siberia."

"It seems very dreadful, very pitiful; and some are ladies, I hear?"

"All the more reason that they should be crushed and exterminated at any cost or sacrifice, for dragging such into their murderous schemes."

"Perhaps you are right," she answered, with the trust of a woman who loves, "and yet—"

"And yet—you think we Russians very cruel. What will you say when I tell you that one of the prisoners is my own nephew, and I am compelled to sit in judgment on my kinsman, and condemn him as a traitor. But justice is justice, and law is law."

The tears stood in her eyes as she answered:

"I see now. Oh, you are noble—nobler than—"

At this moment she was called to appear on the stage, and Prince Saltakoff was left alone to meditate.

He had enough to ponder over, for he had resolved to do what scarcely any man of his rank and position would have dreamed of—namely, to make this actress his wife, if she would have him.

She was better, nobler, lovelier in his eyes than any woman he had ever known; she had been gently born and bred, and he knew her to be as pure as any snow flake, despite of her life; and being an orphan, with no intimate friend except Mlle. Marchmont, with whom she lived, she appealed to him in her utter loneliness for love and protection.

"Do you act to-morrow?" he asked Evelyn, as she and her friend passed through the greenroom on their way to their sledge.

Olga answered for her:

"Of course she does; Rose to my Silvia. Will your highness sup with me after? Lord Castleton is coming, and Madame Bopree."

He assented courteously, but there was a cloud on his face. He liked and believed in Mlle. Olga, but he did not care to think of his Evelyn associating with a woman like Madame Bopree.

Yes, she was his Evelyn in his thoughts already. He would have been less than man had he failed to read aright the timid, yet trusting look of the girl's eyes, as with a low, graceful courtesy she bade him "good-night," and followed her friend.

A visitor was awaiting their arrival. Mlle. Marchmont gasped, and stared at him with wild distended eyes.

He was but a youth of 19, his face was handsome, his manners polished; but his eyes were red and swollen with weeping, and his voice choked with a sob as he said:

"Oh, mademoiselle, all hope is gone; the Emperor will not listen to prayers or supplications, he is doomed to die. My poor Marvyn!—my poor brother."

There was a noise as of some one arriving.

"Hush! I must go, my poor, poor Frank!" and she kissed his forehead as she exclaimed: "I am well nigh wild with grief and sorrow, but I must keep my woman's wit by some means."

"Oh, mademoiselle," he pleaded, "for his sake, for your own."

"My poor boy, don't torture me; can't you guess what my pain must be? But I tell you they shall never—it can't, it shan't be," she added wildly and somewhat incoherently. "Go, Frank, go! somebody is coming."

Her stage power served her well; she shook out her curls and her dress, called up her smiles, and received her visitors with bewitching grace.

It was a very gay supper, burgundy and champagne flowed freely, and after the repast the party played cards.

The fair hostess staked high, careing little whether she lost or won, but fortune favored her, and when the game was over, and the guests departed, she stood running her fingers through a heap of gold which would have made many a gambler feel envious.

"What shall I do with the trumpery?" she said with a hard laugh; "I have more than I require already. Shall I buy you a suite of jewels, Evelyn?" she said, as she passed her arm round her friend's waist.

"No, dear Olga, I want nothing from you but your friendship, and that I prize beyond any gew gews."

Olga leaned her head against the girl's innocent cheek, but did not answer except to say:

"Let's go up stairs, Eva, we will be each other's maids to-night, for I hate Marie's prying eyes."

Olga tossed her tresses back impatiently, and pouring out some fresh water, cleaned her face from its stage paint, which, off the boards, was a disfigurement rather than a grace, for her skin was soft and clear as alabaster.

But when this night she turned, after having laved her face, to Evelyn, the girl was fairly frightened.

"Oh, my dear Olga, what is the matter with you? Are you sick? You look terribly ill!"

There was hardly a trace left of the brilliant actress who had enchained hundreds a few hours before by her magic spells, fascinations and beauty, in the wan, white woman who had faced her friend with a ghastly expression of agony depicted on her haggard countenance.

"Not ill," she answered, "only mad—only the most wretched woman in the world!"

"What is it, dear? Can't you confide in me? Oh, Olga, you frightened me!"

"Yes, I will tell you," and a quick gleam of wild hope lit up her pale face. "You can help me, Eva."

"I! How?"

"I will tell you. It is a life I am asking for—for my heart's happiness, for all that makes life worth living to me."

She spoke eagerly and fiercely.

"What do you mean?" cried Evelyn. "Explain all to me at once."

"I will. Do you remember Mervyn, the Earl of Montrose's son?"

"Yes," Evelyn replied in a tone of great agitation, "of course I do."

"He is one of the suspected Nihilists, and is awaiting the sentence of the Emperor."

"How dreadful," Evelyn remarked.

"He is my husband, I am his wedded wife. We were married secretly for fear of his father's anger, just before I accepted this engagement with you in Russia.

He followed me out here, and then, through being found in the company of these rash men, he was implicated in their vile schemes and put upon his trial. And I have to smile and act and play my part nightly, while my darling, my husband, is in danger of death! Oh, my Mervyn! Child, child!" she moaned, "think of my suffering. I have to hear men's compliments and flattering speeches and smile back to them, while—oh Heaven! my brain seems lost. And he is to die, they say—to die! Oh, it can't be true! it can't be true!"

Evelyn placed her arms round her, and let her sob at her will.

"His brother came to-night," said Olga, "he is the only one who knows of our secret. His heart is broken, poor boy, for he loves Mervyn, as all must who know him. But he says that there is no hope except through the power of Prince Saltakoff, who has the greatest influence over the Emperor, but who refuses to exercise it in the favor of any of the prisoners."

"Prince Saltakoff!" Evelyn exclaimed.

"Yes; now you can guess what I want," she cried, grasping both her friend's hands as in a vise. "The Prince is madly in love with you, he would do for you what he would refuse any one else. Ask him. Oh, dear Eva, you will not deny me this prayer!"

"Olga," and the beautiful girl's face crimsoned, "indeed I have no influence with the Prince."

She moved impatiently.

"Is this a time," she said, "for false modesty and coquettishness? You know as well as I that the man is at your feet. Ask him, I implore you, for our friendship's sake. You are the woman he loves; if he can save him it will be for your sake—and your sake alone; for that reason you must not mention my name, but beg the boon for yourself."

"But, Olga," she exclaimed, confusedly, "he will think I am in love with Mervyn Montrose."

"Of course he will. If he were a different man it might be a dangerous game to play, but he is a gentleman in every sense of the word, and if he thinks your happiness rests on Mervyn's life, will, I firmly believe, do his best to save him."

Evelyn was silent as Olga continued:

"I would not ask this of you, dear, if I thought you cared for him, or if it were possible that his intentions were to woo you as a wife."

Evelyn turned away wearily.

"I cannot answer you to-night," she said, slowly; "I will to-morrow."

All Olga's entreaties failed to move her, and she went sadly to her own room and tried to sleep, but could not.

"Olga must be right," the poor child thought, as she lay awake, trying to still the bitter pain of the thought that the pure, high minded gentleman she had always esteemed him had only been amusing himself, and perhaps had fancied that she would have consented at last to become even his mistress.

The big tears strayed heavily down her face, wetting her pillow, as she thought how she loved him, and wondered if he would believe she was in love with Mervyn Montrose.

Her task was a hard one to perform.

But there arose before her the vision of the horrible drama of a felon's death, of Olga's face, as she had seen it to-night, ghastly and gray with grief. If she were able to prevent this, she must do it, at what cost to herself mattered little.

CHAPTER II.

It was past 10 the next morning when Olga entered Evelyn's dressing-room.

"Will you do what I asked you last night?" she asked, as she embraced her friend.

And Evelyn answered:

"Yes."

"God bless you: He will bless you, dear girl!" and her voice sank lower. "You have done more than you know. It is not only for our sakes I have prayed you, but for that of an unborn child, who, if Mervyn dies, will never know its father. My darling husband has been dearer to me than ever since I have known—"

A great pity and love stirred Evelyn's heart. She forgot herself, and only thought of comforting and soothing the woman who, till now, had been the leading spirit in their friendship.

Prince Saltakoff sat alone in his stalls. A frown of displeasure contracted his brow at the man who played Romeo to Evelyn's Juliet.

He felt it would have been the greatest pleasure of his life to knock him down.

When the play was over he went round to the green room, where he found Olga and Evelyn, the latter already cloaked.

"Will you escort mademoiselle home, your highness?" said Olga. "She is not very well to-night; but I have to play in the afterpiece, so must remain."

He handed her into the sledge, and as he did so, felt her hand sake.

"You are faint," he said, as they entered the hotel; "you must have some wine."

"No, thank you," she returned, "I prefer a cup of coffee; it will do my headache good. Will you join me, or have some wine yourself?"

Of course he declared in favor of coffee.

The time was very sweet to him; to Evelyn it was painful, for she was trying to find words in which she could best ask for Mervyn Montrose's life.

She leaned back on her couch, looking very pale in her soft colorless dress of delicate lace, with only a cluster of carnations fastened in her bosom.

"Your highness," she ventured to articulate, "I have a favor to ask of you."

"A favor?" his eyes lit up; "how can I serve you?"

"I'm afraid to ask you—I'm ashamed."

"My child, you can have no cause for shame or fear, surely. If I can serve you, let me. I am at your service."

"What I would beg—" she hesitated, and then spoke with a nervous impetuosity as fearing her courage might fail her. "It is a life, your highness, that I ask—the life of a friend! Oh, if you can save him, say you will."

"Whose life, Evelyn Chatteris?"

"One of the so called Nihilists, Mervyn Montrose."

A hot blush overspread her face as she spoke.

The prince read it wrongly, and, remembering the young and handsome prisoner, he thought he understood all.

"His life is dear to you?" he said, in a trembling voice. "If so I would do much to save him."

She did not answer, but her eyes fell before his steady gaze.

He ascribed it to modesty, and he forced back the thought of himself and only remembered her.

"Forgive me," he said, gently, I had no right to ask that question, except that of a friend—a true one. Believe me, Mlle. Chateris, I thank you for having trusted me."

He was grave and reserved enough now. His keen sense of honor showed him that if he was to help her no sign of his own love must escape him, so his best security lay in formality and coldness.

"You will save him?" she pleaded. "He is so young to die, and he meant no harm."

And he never thought how beautiful she was till now she was lost to him.

"God knows," he said; "it is hard to decide rightly in such a case as this."

"Mercy cannot err," she whispered, with white lips.

"Except when it be a weakness," he replied.

"And you will not try to save him?" she cried.

"Certainly I will; if I have any influence with the emperor it shall be used. I cannot say more—I wish I could—but I am his imperial majesty's servant as well as your friend. Will you trust me?"

She held out her hand in answer; she could not speak.

He raised it to his lips, and started to find how cold it was.

"Good-bye," he said, "and heaven bless you!" He was gone.

Aye, good-bye to his own love dream, to his dearest! How dear he had not known till now.

Two days later Mlle. Olga was walking up and down her saloon reciting a new part.

There was a restless eagerness in her manner, which showed her mind was ill at ease.

"What trash this is!" she exclaimed as she cast the part from her contemptuously.

Evelyn now raised her head at the impetuosity of her friend.

Her eyes were sad, and the faint smile on her lips was more pitiful than tears.

Olga went forward and knelt down beside her, and drew the brown head on her breast, saying:

"Eva, child, you are not well; you are keeping something from me."

"No, Olga, it is nothing; I am quite well."

"Then I vow you must be in love. Oh, tell me it was not with—"

But Evelyn drew herself away from her friend's embrace, and stood before her with flushed cheeks and eyes sparkling with anger.

"Olga, that is a question you have no right to ask."

"And which you have answered, my poor Eva! I did not know how selfish I have been—forgive me."

"I have nothing to forgive, Olga. I did it; you could not guess."

"And I never dreamed how you had given up your happiness for mine, dear, dear Eva. How can I thank you? tell me."

"By never reminding me of it, or—" The girl was going to add, "my heart will break," but she refrained from fear of paining her friend.

Olga turned to the window to hide the tears which started to her eyes; she was touched to the very soul to find how blindly noble Evelyn's friendship had proved.

Suddenly she turned from the window and exclaimed excitedly:

"Eva, Eva! here is the prince in one of the imperial carriages; you see him—I cannot. It must be some news about Mervyn. Oh, do not keep me in suspense, but come to my room and tell me!"

Saying which she hastily left Evelyn alone.

The prince opened the door and entered unannounced. His manner was hurried and excited, all his lofty staidness had left him as he approached Evelyn and said:

"Your presence is required at once; it is the command of the emperor. There is no time to be lost. It you wish to save your friend, your—" he was about to add 'lover,' you must obey the summons at once."

CHAPTER III.

A hurried explanation to Olga, a murmured prayer for her success with the emperor, and hastily donning costly sables she entered the magnificently-appointed carriage, with its six thoroughbred horses champing their bits impatiently.

They were quickly driven to the Winter Palace of the Czar.

Her excitement was intense, and her eyes were lit up with unusual splendor.

And a sudden temptation seized the prince as he thought:

"This treasure might be mine even yet, and he banished to Siberia; only one word in the Czar's ear and he would never cross her path again in life."

But the next minute the traitorous thought was cast from his heart by the innocent look of hope and confidence that betrayed itself in every look and gesture of the beautiful girl who sat by his side.

A cold perspiration stood upon his brow as he contemplated the great temptation that had assailed him, when she put up her little hand in his, and looking up into his face, as an adoring worshipper might into that of a saint's, said:

"How can I ever thank or repay you for your unselfish, devoted kindness to me? How I wish that my poor words could convey to you, or that my heart could reveal to you my gratitude, my—"

"Forbear, Evelyn; you know not how you torture me," he exclaimed vehemently.

Further conversation ceased, for the equipage had now entered one of the courtways of the palace.

Evelyn was conscious of being hurriedly led through gorgeous apartments, from ante-room to ante room, where she was requested by the prince to stay until he joined her.

A perfumed warmth permeated the atmosphere, and Evelyn was just in the act of dipping her handkerchief into the fountain to cool her fevered brow, when Prince Saltakoff entered, accompanied by two pages of honor, and she was requested to attend the imperial presence.

Summoning all her courage, she passed on at last with a firm and dignified bearing into the presence of his imperial majesty Alexander II.

Prince Saltakoff led her to a dias where the Czar sat, looking anything but the proud aristocrat that so many people erroneously styled him.

She saw a benign, intellectual, kind-featured man, with a sympathetic and fatherly expression on his noble countenance, as his eyes fell upon the lovely girl, and he saw the look of deep anxiety and pain depicted on every lineament of her face.

She would have knelt at his feet, but he would not permit her, but seated her himself on a divan, saying:

"And so you have come to plead for the life of Mervyn Montrose; and no English woman shall ask a favor at our hands in vain. Beside, it has come to our ears within the last hour that he was not so implicated as we had thought; but we must impose one condition—that he leaves Russia within four and-twenty hours."

She caught the Czar's hand in hers, and kissed it tenderly and fervently, saying:

"I am indeed grateful, your majesty, and shall pray for you night and—"

But her further utterance was stopped by her fast-falling tears.

The pent-up excitement proved too much, and she would have fallen at the Emperor's feet, but for the strong arm of the prince, who led her from the apartment in a faint and exhausted condition.

They were soon back at the hotel, and Evelyn ran, rather than walked, up the broad flights of stairs and burst into the apartment of her friend crying:

"Saved! saved!" and they flew into each other's arms and shed tears of joy and laughed by turns.

"And so you saw the Czar?" she said a little more calmly, "and he didn't eat you up, or order you to the lowest dungeon of his palace?"

"No, dear Olga; he is what an emperor should be—a king of men and a true gentleman—but we forget the prince is waiting to congratulate me upon the escape of poor Mervyn Montrose."

"How thoughtless and remiss I am in my happiness and joy; I forgot the one who has helped to bring it about. Run, dearest Eva, while I bathe my face, for I should not like to be seen in such a sorry plight."

She returned to the prince, who, looking at her very kindly, said:

"Now I trust you are happy, and that you have found me the friend that I wished to prove myself."

"I cannot express to you what I think, or how to thank you," she began.

"You need not; I have done nothing; but you will permit me to wish you joy before I leave you forever," and his voice faltered as he continued: "He must be very near and dear to you."

"Oh no!" she cried, as a burning flush suffused her face, neck and brow; "you are mistaken—he is nothing, never can be—"

"Do you mean that he is not your affianced husband?" he said, as he caught her hand in his; answer me truly; do not trifle with me now."

"He is not, and never has been a lover of mine. He is my friend Olga's husband."

"I understand it all now," he cried, as he caught her in a warm embrace, and said: "My Evelyn."

The glow on her cheek became deeper; she tried to release herself, but he held her too tightly, as he murmured.

"Will you be my wife, my own cherished wife?

"Do you mean you love me?" she whispered.

"What else should I mean, Evelyn? You have given me great pain; will you not make amends by marrying me at once?"

"It shall be as you wish," she murmured, as her head nestled on his bosom.

They were so lost in their dream of love that they were unaware of the presence of Olga, who stood over them and in a roguish bantering tone said:

"Bless you my children, bless you."

That evening Mervyn Montrose and his wife, armed with passports, were on their way to England, where they devoutly made up their minds to remain for the rest of their lives.

Just before the birth of their child Mervyn broke the news of his marriage to the earl, who put the best face on it under the circumstances, as he said grumblingly:

"It is not the first scion of a noble house that has made a fool of himself over an actress; nor, I suppose, will be the last."

Evelyn was married to Prince Saltakoff at the chapel of the English embassy, and received on the wedding day, a magnificent parure of diamonds and rubies, the bridal gift of the emperor.

One condition was imposed by his majesty, and that was that six months of that year were to be spent by the prince and princess in Russia.

As years rolled on, and the wedded happiness of the Montroses deepened with time, Evelyn, herself a happy wife and mother, never regretted the part she played of the stage in the little comedy, "For Pity's Sake."

A Glance at Some of the Law-Makers at Harrisburg.

The correspondent of the Sunday Scranton Republican gravely affirms that the house of representatives is a body peculiar to itself. I venture to say that, if that staid and dignified body, the senate, was transplanted in the house, in a week the grave and reverend boys of the higher branch would be just as hoydenish and full of mischief as the biggest infant in the house. It's catchin'. But they are not all kittenish and frolicsome. A few of them are very dignified. Take J. McDowell Sharpe, of Franklin, for instance. He is very dignified. When J. McDowell arises and looks wise at the speaker and sideways at the Republicans on the other side of the house, it is two to one that some vigorous English is about to be launched. Shorpe's greatest defect is one he cannot cure—he is very deaf. If I had the bank account of Willis J. Hulings, the young oil member from Venango, you wouldn't catch me monkeying around a legislature. Beside his money Hulings has that jovial good-nature that characterizes all.

He was telling me how he might have made $3,000,000 by buying an Arizona copper claim, near Tucson, for $19,000. "Why didn't you take it?" I asked. "Because another fellow got in ahead of me. I never was born to be rich." Considering that his shekels will aggregate about $200,000, I think Mr. Hulings hovered on the borders of truth when he made that last remark. Uncle Jake Zeigler is a state character. All Democratic state conventions are hushed when Uncle Jake gets up to talk. Just so does the house calm down and listen when the frosty-poled son of Butler speaks. Next to Uncle Jake sits Furth, of Philadelphia, an exceedingly fresh young man. I believe I'd say something mean about Furth if he wasn't such an accommodating gentleman. He is always courteous, and the best talker for a Hebrew I ever

THE COLUMBIAN.

G. E. Elwell, J. K. Dittenbender., } Editors.

BLOOMSBURG, PA.

FRIDAY, MAY 11, 1883.

The jury rendered a verdict of "guilty of forgery" in the case of Major Phipps, on Saturday last. A motion was made for a new trial.

Red Cloud claims to have discovered a gold mine; now if he comes East and sells a million of stocks in the enterprise we shall begin to think that civilization is making some headway among the savages.

William H. Vanderbilt has retired from the Presidency of the New York Central, and Michigan Southern railroads. James H. Rutter was elected President of the New York Central, and John Newell of the Michigan Southern.

One of the largest retail fur trades that ever took place in Maine was made at Kines a few days ago. The lot purchased consisted of one hundred and twenty beaver skins, ten fisher or "black cat," forty sable, four lynx, and a large number of smaller skins, all taken within eight weeks.

Robert Cator and Anthony Maloney, two well known Schuylkill county racers, ran a one mile race in Athletic Park, Ashland, last Saturday afternoon for $25 a side. The race was run in a pouring rain, the track being heavy and muddy. The men were literally covered with mud at the finish. Maloney won the race in five minutes and eighteen seconds.

Governor Pattison has intimated that if the Legislature does not pass the Apportionment bills, he will call an extra session for that purpose. He maintains, with considerable force, that the constitution ordains that an apportionment shall be made. It is the duty of the Legislature to make one, and he has taken an oath to see that the laws and the constitution are faithfully executed.

Every person leaving Russia for residence abroad is taxed $5 for his passport, a part of which sum goes to the pension fund of the army. Quite a stir has been made among the upper classes of cities, like Moscow and St. Petersburg, by a proposition to add to this a further tax of $5 a month, or $60 a year, during absence, the payments to be made to the nearest Russian consul. Persons who fail to do this will be detained on the frontier when they return, and there obliged to pay their arrears, plus 10 per cent. compound interest. It is estimated that, on an average, about 100,000 persons cross the frontier on business or pleasure every year.

The Apportionment Bills.

The new congressional apportionment bill, reported in the legislature, gives a delegation—it is claimed—of nineteen sure Republican districts, seven sure Democratic districts, and two doubtful. The XVIth district is constituted as follows: Bradford, Tioga, Lycoming, Sullivan and Montour. The senatorial apportionment bill puts Lycoming, Columbia and Montour together, and calls the district the XXVIIth.

County Officers' Salaries.

Senate bill fixing the salaries of county officers in counties containing 40,000 inhabitants and less than 58,000, passed that body. It provides for the payment of salaries as follows: District attorney, $800; sheriff, $3,000; prothonotary, $2,000; clerk of the orphans' court, $1,500; clerk of quarter sessions, $1,000; register, $1,500; recorder of deeds, $1,500; treasurer, $2,000; county commissioners $600 each; auditors, $100 each; keeper of prison or county jail, $700; directors of the poor, $100 each; jury commissioners, $75 each. Where the offices of clerk of orphans' court or quarter sessions and recorder of deeds were held by the same person, such officer shall receive $2,000. Where the offices of recorder of deeds and register of wills are held by the same person, $2,000; where the offices of clerk of orphans' court and clerk of quarter sessions are held by the same person, $1,200. In case the offices of register, recorder and clerk of orphans' court are held by the same officer, the salary will be $2,000. The bill applies to Delaware, McKean, Tioga, Susquehanna, Northumberland, Cumberland, Franklin, Clearfield, Blair, Cambria, Indiana, Clarion, Armstrong, Butler, Washington, Mercer, Venango and Lycoming counties.

Hayes and the Conductor.

A RAILROAD MAN WHO KNEW HIS DUTY AND WAS PROMOTED FOR DOING IT.

[From the Boston Traveller.

Mr. Hayes was traveling, absorbed in the affairs of the State, when he was politely waited upon by the conductor of the train and his ticket requested. The President explained who he was, but the conductor said that his orders were imperative. He was obliged to show something at the end of his route for every passenger who traveled with him, and it did not make any difference who the man was, he must either have a ticket, a pass or the money. As President Hayes had neither a ticket nor a pass, he reluctantly pulled out his pocketbood and counted enough money to pay his passage.

Hayes was a very close man in money matters, and he was highly indignant at the treatment he had undergone. At the end of the road he stalked into the office of the President of the railroad and laid the facts before him, with a request that the conductor be either discharged or reprimanded. The railroad official calmly paid him back the money which he had given the conductor for his fare, and Mr. Hayes continued his journey in a much happier frame of mind. The conductor when he found out that the President of the U. S., had made a complaint against him, was very apprehensive, and his fear of dismissal was by no means allayed when he received a summons from the President of the road to come at once to headquarters.

When he arrived Mr. Hayes's story was repeated to him, and he was asked if he had anything to say. Mr. Conductor took the rules out of his pocket and read them, saying that he saw nothing which exempted any passenger, even so high a personage as the President of the United States. He was then told that it was not the purpose of the President of the road to dismiss him for a breach of rules, but that he was to be promoted to a more responsible position, with a much higher salary, for his faithfulness.

Suing Mason's Wife.

Mrs. Betty Mason has filed answer in the Equity Court at Washington to the suit of Benjamin F. Bigelow for counsel fees in defending her husband, Sergeant Mason. She states that Bigelow volunteered to assume the case and was not of her choice; that she never agreed to pay him for his services, but had of her own volition paid him $370, for which she holds his receipt; that he connected himself with her husband's defense only for his own glorification and for the benefit of his reputation, and finally she denies the jurisdiction of the court and holds that his claim is not good in equity, but must be prosecuted as any other civil action.

The Richest.

To-day William H. Vanderbilt stands the richest man on the American continent. He has $150,000,000 of money in United States bonds. He owns railroads, and land, coal fields and iron mountains, the best wire and the fastest horses. His home is a palace and his barn more sumptuous in its arrangement than the home of many a millionaire. His table is supplied by the best markets in the world, prepared by the most skillful cooks, and yet there is a suspicion, amounting to almost a positive belief, that his life is not a happy one. His riches are a burden; they hang about him like mill-stones about the neck of the man thrown into the sea. Vanderbilt is not a popular man; money is his god and the people are but things to wring money out of. What cares he for the toiling masses? What cares he for anything or anybody except his property and himself? He is nothing more than a greedy, grasping miser, damning everybody but himself, and perchance in the quiet solitudes of his grand palace, he himself may not be excluded. With the wealth that he can command, he could make the name of Peter Cooper sink into insignificance, but as yet he appears only as a grand and miserable failure by the side of New York's honored philianthropist.—Grit.

A Terrific Storm.

A terrible thunder storm visited Chambersburg, Franklin county, on last Friday night. The bolts of lightning were blinding and the peals of thunder terrific. The rain descended in torrents, swelling the streams considerably and in a number of places doing much damage to the growing crops. About twelve o'clock lightning struck Shanks Tunker church, situated about one mile and a half south of Greencastle, burning it to the ground. The building was a large brick one, and was one of the finest and largest owned by that denomination in this county. The lightning struck near the roof, running along the cornice and setting the entire upper part on fire. The light was distinctly seen in Greencastle, and the alarm given. One of the companies responded promptly and it, with the assistance assistance of the citizens of town, succeeded in removing all the property in the lower part of the building, There was a quanity of bedding, bedsteads, dishes; knives, forks, etc., used at the love feasts in the attic, which were burned. The building is totally destroyed, only a portion of the walls standing. There was no insurance upon the church as the Tunkers do not have their houses of worship insured. About six o'clock in the evening the James M. Brown homestead at Brown's Mill, occupied by Hiram Small, was also struck. The family, fortunately, were at the barn attending to the feeding and milking, thus escaping all injury. The bolt struck the rod, which proved a non-conductor. The fluid ran down through the house and out to the cistern, setting the building on fire in several places, and before any asssistance could be procured the entire building was enveloped in flames, and all of it that remained is a charred and blackened mass. The family succeeded in saving a large portion of the furniture, but a great deal was lost. The building was stone and frame.

Two of the Phœnix Park Assassins Make a Confession.

There was quite a sensation at the opening of the trial of Patrick Delaney and Thomas Cafferty, two of the men charged with participation in the Phœnix Park murders, before Judge O'Brien in Dublin. The two had scarcely been seated in the prisoners' dock before they asked to be heard, and formally entered a plea of guilty, and, despite assurances that their confession would in no way lighten the penalty, they persisted in having it entered.

When Delaney was called upon to plead, he said: "I am guilty of being in the park at the time Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Burke were killed, but I did not commit murder. I plead guilty to that, but not to murdering them." The Judge explained to him that this really amounted to a plea of innocence. Delaney then formally pleaded guilty. He said: "I was brought into this at first foolishly, not knowing what it was. I was forced from my work to go to the park. We had to obey the orders of the society or take the consequences. When I got in the park I could not get away. I saw the murders committed, but took no part in them. I went to the park on Kavanagh's car. He speaks the truth. So does Carey. The murders were committed by Joe Brady and Timothy Kelly, and by nobody else. I saved Judge Lawson's life at the risk of my own. I was put on to shoot him by Mullett and Brady, and the only way to escape the task was by calling the guard's attention."

Judge O'Brien, in passing sentence on Delaney, said he had a duty to perform. He had, at the previous trial of the prisoner for attempting to shoot Judge Lawson, pitied him, because he showed some feeling for the wife and family. The prisoner would see to what misery they had been brought by the wicked system of the conspiracy. The enormity of the crime and the peace and welfare of society precluded the possibility of passing any sentence but that of death. The fact that he had pleaded guilty could not, unfortunately, be taken into account, and the prisoner was well aware of it before he made his confession. The Judge then sentenced him to be hanged on June 2 next.

When Caffrey was placed in the dock his face wore a smile. The consequence of pleading guilty was again fully explained to him in open court, but he persisted in his plea. On being asked whether he had anything to say why sentence should not be passed upon him, Caffrey replied, in a loud, clear voice: "All I have to say, standing as I am on the brink of the grave, is that when I went to Phœnix Park I did not know what was going to happen until twenty minutes before the murder was committed. I was bound to go to the Park under pain of death."

He was sentenced to be hanged on the same day as Delaney.

Crop Reports for May.

The North Texas reporter for the National Agricultural Bureau makes the following crop report for May 1:

"Wheat is late but looks well; and barley hardly an average, but little of the former sown. Native hay, our only spring pasture is looking well; corn all planted and good stand; cotton not all planted, but some is up; the stand will be good, having had rains recently. There will be less planted owing to the low prices and scarcity of labor, particularly at packing time. The farmers are behind hand with their spring plowing. The spring planting of all crops are about the same as last year. There will be a large crop of millet. Our season and planting this year are about twenty days late, notwithstanding which prospects are good. The recent rains have given new life, and planters are cheerful and hopeful."

Reports on Dixmont Asylum.

The Dixmont Asylum reports are published. Senator Hart, of this district, signs the majority one, which does not convict the management of permitting the maltreatment of patients, or the detention of insane persons. It does however, assume that the State, by reason of the large amount it contributes to the support of the institution, should have a controlling influence in the management, and recommends legislation with that in view. It further alleges that Dr. Reed is too much enfeebled physically for the arduous duties devolving upon him, and argues that the medical supervision of the patients and the business management of the concern should be in other hands. It charges that patients have been admitted to Dixmont upon the certificate of an outside physician, and one of the two assistant physicians connected with the institution, which is a violation of the law, and a plain wrong. The keeper of an insane person should not be empowered to have part in deciding whether he should be placed under his control as keeper. The minority report claims that Dr. Reed is in the power of intellectual strength, and fully competent in every way for his trust. They say private parties have contributed at least a half million of dollars to the institution and that there is neither law nor fairness in the assumed right of the State to take the management out of the hands of these individual donors. They point to the Tewksbury investigation now in progress in Massachusetts as sufficient evidence that hospitals managed by States may be infamously managed. They admit that the certificates of the insanity of the proposed patients by physicians connected with the hospital is a questionable practice, but explains that it sometimes saves expense to parties who would otherwise be seriously burdened by the cost of securing the admission of friends needing the care and treatment of the institution. The reports were laid on the table to be disposed of when printed. — Williamsport Sun and Banner.

HALL'S VEGETABLE SICILIAN
Hair Renewer.

Seldom does a popular remedy win such a strong hold upon the public confidence as has HALL'S HAIR RENEWER. The cases in which it has accomplished a complete restoration of color to the hair, and vigorous health to the scalp, are innumerable.

Old people like it for its wonderful power to restore to their whitening locks their original color and beauty. Middle-aged people like it because it prevents them from getting bald, keeps dandruff away, and makes the hair grow thick and strong. Young ladies like it as a dressing because it gives the hair a beautiful glossy lustre, and enables them to dress it in whatever form they wish. Thus it is the favorite of all, and it has become so simply because it disappoints no one.

ADMINISTRATOR'S NOTICE.

ESTATE OF A. B. VANLIEW LATE OF HEMLOCK TOWNSHIP, COLUMBIA COUNTY, PA., DECEASED.

Letters of administration to the estate of A. B. Vanliew, late of Hemlock township, Columbia county, Pa., deceased, have been granted by the Register of said county to A. C. Vanliew and Jacob Terwilliger, adm'rs. All persons having claims against said deceased are requested to present them for settlement, and those indebted to the estate to make payment to the undersigned administrators without delay.

A. C. VANLIEW,
JACOB TERWILLIGER,
apr 2 6w* Administrators.

Three Strong Points.

Point One:

Men's Spring Overcoats; a big stock that takes in everything from the very plain low priced to the finest, from the lightest fancy color to the plain black, from the smallest youths' to the largest of large men's sizes. A commanding stock that every light overcoat buyer must see—if he cares to know the market.

Point Two:

Fifteen Lines of Men's Business Suits. A little money is a powerful thing in Oak Hall. Witness the following:

Fancy Cassimere Sack Suits at $8.50, and the same goods in walking coat style, at $9.00. Our only boast on them is that they are good for the money. Manhattan Cheviots in six full lines, both sacks and walking coats, at $10.00. The buttons and trimmings of these suits are worth special attention. Plain Cassimeres: three varieties, in sack style, at $10.00. Very reliable.

Five styles of Harris Cassimere Suits, of quiet styles, and in both Sack and Walking Coats, at $16.00. The well-known reputation of these goods speak for themselves.

These fifteen lines are not fragments pulled together for an advertisement. They represent two thousand suits, and goods to make more. There is business in them.

Point Three:

Custom Made Clothing. A large display of piece goods to order. There are very great bargains in all the following lines:

Class A,	in any ordinary business style,	$18.00
Class B,	" " " "	20.00
Class C,	" " " "	22.50
Class D,	" " " "	25.00

Our "points" are made short and sharp for practical people.

Rupture
Relieved and cured by Dr. J. A. SHERMAN'S method, without regard to age or duration of the affliction, or the injury trusses inflict, or hindrance from labor, and security from strangulation—of which, according to statistics, not less than 30,000 died during the past year. No one is safe who has a rupture and depends upon a truss; both are a physical and mental tax; bring on kidney, bladder and other organic diseases, which affect general health more than age or labor, besides affecting manhood and destroying all incentives to social pleasure. Patients from abroad can receive treatment and leave for home same day. Dr. Sherman's book, with photographic likeness of bad cases, before and after cure, and indorsements by Physicians, Merchants, Farmers and others who have been cured, mailed for 10c. Send for it and inform yourself. Principal office, 251 Broadway, N. Y.; days of consultation each week, Mondays, Tuesdays and Saturdays

The entertainment at the Normal School last Friday evening was well attended, notwithstanding the threatening weather. Everything passed off very nicely, though for a time the beating of the hail against the windows made such a clatter that one could scarcely hear what was going on. Some of the brooms used by the young ladies in the drill were handsomely decorated and brought high prices at auction.

Harman & Hassert still continue to do a thriving business. They are crowded with orders for new work, and can scarcely fill the demand for repairs. A few more such enterprising people would give employment to all our idle men. Let those with capital be on the lookout for some enterprising people and help them in some manufactory and they will reap a greater dividend than by any other investment, and have the satisfaction of giving labor to those in need.

A terrific storm passed over this section of the State last Friday night. There was wind, rain and hail combined. The most damage done in this county was at Orangeville, where cellars were filled with water, gardens washed, and walks torn up. The principal losers are Samuel Hagenbuch, Mr. Mears, Mr. Hicks, Mrs. Kline and Mr. Mastellar. In many other places through the county the fields were badly washed. Near Eyers Grove two head of cattle were killed by lightning. It was one of the heaviest storms that has visited this section for a long time.

The Danville people are still unwilling to give up the fight concerning the place where the annual encampment of the Third Brigade shall be held, although Williamsport has been decided upon by Gen. Seigfreid. Col. Ramsey, J. L. Reihl and Peter McCann went to Harrisburg last week to present to the Adjutant General the advantages of that town for the encampment. In the absence of Adjutant General Guthrie the committee waited on the governor to whom the case was stated. Among other things it was alleged by locating the camp at Danville $3,000 would be saved to the state in transportation. Other advantages were also referred to.

We wanted it here, too, but after we were beaten, we quit.

The case of Books vs. the Borough of Danville is now occupying the attention of the court. It is an action brought by the husband for damages for the death of his wife, caused by falling down an unprotected embankment. There is a number of attorneys on each side, and a warm contest is going on.

At a meeting of the stockholders of the Normal School held last Monday afternoon for the election of trustees, the following persons were elected: L. B. Rupert, F. P. Billmeyer, Conrad Bittenbender and Dr. J. Schuyler. Col. S. Knorr, Dr. McReynolds, L. Bernhard and F. Brown were suggested two of whom will be appointed as trustees on the part of the State.

Appointed a Justice of the Peace.

John M. Clark, Esq., has been appointed a Justice of the Peace for this town, to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of J. H. Maize, Esq., who resigned the position so that he could give closer attention to his paper mill business. The appointment of Mr. Clark was asked for by a number of leading citizens, and made without opposition.

A Dastardly Outrage.

Miss Emma Whitmer, a young lady residing in Milford township, Lehigh county, awoke one morning about two months ago to find that during the still hours of the night some miscreant had come to her bedside and cut off her luxuriant crop of jet black hair close to the head, leaving scarcely enough to shield the scalp. She grieved greatly over her loss, and soon after went into consumption, which caused her death. The perpetrator of the outrage upon her was never discovered.

Not on the Third Floor.

The COLUMBIAN office is on the first floor of the brick building two doors below the Exchange hotel, known as the COLUMBIAN building. The name appears on the window curtains, and on the bulletin board on the pavement. We call attention to this because so many people come to our building and climb up to the third floor to find us, when a little observation would save the trip up two flights of stairs. The front room is occupied by our stationery department, which is the cause, probably, of misleading.

Mountain Grove Camp Meeting.

The directors of the Mountain Grove camp meeting association met at Berwick, last Thursday and decided to hold the camp meeting this year, beginning Wednesday, August 8. Dr. E. M. Low presided at the meeting of the board. It was decided to hold the meeting with closed gates on Sunday, the same as last year. A committee, with W. M. Gearhart as chairman, was appointed to confer with the railroad company and try to secure the running of two regular trains each way during the camp. This camp has been very successful in past years. Last year, after paying considerable money for repairs, occasioned by a storm the winter before, they paid the stockholders a dividend of four per cent. Rev. M. L. Smyser will have charge of the services this year.

A Double Headed Being.

Millie Christine is one of the greatest of living wonders. She is now on exhibition in J. B. Doris' circus. This remarkable young lady is a mulatto, and says she was born in 1851 in North Carolina. She is below medium height, and has two perfectly formed busts and heads, the bodies being back to back. Below the waist she has the organism of a single individual, with the exception of the fact that she possesses four limbs. Her carriage is extremely graceful, and she uses two or four limbs at will in walking. Mentally, it is difficult to understand the phenomenon. She speaks of herself and is addressed in the singular number, and while she talks with one head or the other, it is understood that mentally she is but one person, a fact which doubtless contributes to the peace and happiness of this singular being, as it precludes the possibility of a wordy war between herself, the terrible consequences of which can scarcely be fancied. The lady is well educated, speaking several languages fluently, and singing soprano with one head and contralto with the other. Her weight is 205 pounds.

The Editorial Life.

At the funeral of Col. L. L. Tate last week Thursday at Williamsport, Rev. S. E. Webster made some appropriate remarks, among them being the following:

"A long and laborious life has been brought to a close. The profession of a journalist is no sinecure. To have walked in the editorial ranks for fifty years, was not to traverse a path of roses nor to have been borne along in indolent ease. The life of an editor is one of many vicissitudes, much rivalry, strong antagonisms. No greater battles have been fought on tented field with the edge of a sword like those battles which have been fought with the pen. There has been war to the very hilt in many editorial sanctums. To have been a journalist during the past fifty years of our national existence means hard work, heated brain, midnight oil, the suffering of bitter innuendo and gross misrepresentation. And yet journalism is a profession of high distinction, one of the most honorable and when conducted aright, one of the most needed. No agency, save the pulpit, has so educated the sentiment of the public, so directed the mind of the people, so moulded legislation. The press must not only direct the thought of the people, but do the thinking for the people. This has been preeminently true during the past fifty years of our nation's life. No country, perhaps, has had such a varied history, has undergone so many changes, has encountered so many vicissitudes. Our changeful political complexion, our wars, our financial crisis, our unprecedented growth, our gigantic enterprises, and our influential states among the nations, have all contributed to and made necessary the most vigorous application of journalistic energy. During all these changes Col. Tate has wielded a strong pen, has consecrated his life with singleness of purpose and with unswerving decision. During all his life he has stood by the one party, has adhered to its principles, has fought its battles; whatever may be men's political predilections, however they may differ in relation to any interest of life, they will respect a man of strong conviction. A man, who, believing he is right, will stand by his principles, commands the respect of thoughtful men, is indeed every inch a man, is a king among men by "divine ordination."

Tuesday's Storm.

A terrific storm passed through this section on Tuesday afternoon, but the people of Bloomsburg were fortunate enough not to be visited. The storm was a genuine western cyclone. At Berwick there was much damage done. The storm came in from the north-west. The roof and part of a building on one of M. W. Jackson's farms was torn down. A shed was blown over on six head of cattle, but they were rescued without injury. A sign was blown down on a little girl named Clewell, but she escaped with a few bruises. Trees and fences were blown down. About one-third of the roof of the bridge crossing the Susquehanna was blown off, at a loss of about $700. A portion of the roof of the barn of Mr. Wooley at stoneytown was torn off. The gable end and part of the roof of J. S. Hagenbuch's barn were damaged, and an outhouse of Robert Pursel in Lightstreet was thrown down. Large trees were blown down, but no damage done by them. Across the river at Nescopeck the storm increased in severity, uprooting trees, demolishing fences and sheds, and causing a general destruction. As the storm reached the Hazleton turnpike it grew more fierce and struck a small town called Briggsville with such force as to almost destroy the entire village. The fences all along were swept away. Above Nescopeck on the hill a new church was blown down. At Drifton one of the large breakers was swept piece by piece level to the earth. By the flying missiles and falling timbers many of the employees were hurt. Two men were crushed to death. The breaker is the property of Senator Coxe and is a total wreck.

A similar storm visited Williamsport, accompanied by loud thunder and vivid lightning. Several houses were struck by lightning, but no serious damage was done to them. The large woolen factory of Stadon & Brother was completely unroofed, the tin being rolled up, carried across the street and lodged on the top of two maple trees standing in the front yard of the residence of William Stadon, one of the proprietors of the mill. The building was deluged with water, greatly damaging the stock, cloths and machinery. The loss will probably reach $1,000. Farm fences and telegraph poles along the railroads below the city suffered very much. This storm passed on and reached Danville, where its fury had not abated. A whirlwind took possession of Mill street a moment before the storm burst, and pedestrians made for places of shelter to avoid danger. The roofs of houses occupied by employees of the Montour Iron Company were lifted from their fastenings and hurled into the streets, and the handsome steeple of the new Episcopal church, it is thought, has suffered somewhat from the violence of the wind. Trees were uprooted, and the branches were carried everywhere. Many window panes were blown in by the action of the elements.

We certainly should consider ourselves highly favored to be thus surrounded by two terrible gales and not suffer any damage. There was a slight wind storm here and a little rain, but nothing uncommon.

GRAND JURY'S REPORT.

COLUMBIA COUNTY, ss

The Grand Inquest of Pennsylvania inquiring for the body of Columbia county respectfully report that we have discharged our duties in the matter of the presentment of bills of indictment that have been laid before us:—

That we have examined the public buildings and make the following recommendations:

That the county jail be thoroughly cleansed and disinfected, and that a competent engineer be employed at once to examine into the matter of drainage for said jail, and report thereon; and that the proper drain be made as soon as possible, at the county's expense. The building in its present condition is utterly unfit for the residence or incarceration of human beings and must remain so until properly drained. Also that the roofs of said jail be examined by competent workmen, and repaired. That telephones be placed at the County's expense, in the Court House and said for, for the use of public officers. Also, that U. H. Ent, ex-Sheriff, be paid twenty eight dollars—money expended by him personally, for telephone during his term of office. That we find the Court House and other buildings in a fair condition.

Respectfully submitted,
FRANK P. DRINKER,
Foreman.

Beautiful Plush card cases containing 50 gilt edged calling cards, only 75 cents at the COLUMBIAN store. 25 cents extra for printing name. These are the handsomest goods for the money ever offered in this town.

Susannah Creasy, widow of the late Nathan Creasy, died at her residence in Catawissa Twp., on the 3rd of May and was buried in Catawissa, on Saturday May 5 She was a daughter of Henry and Susan Krickbaum, both of whom have long since passed away, the former having died in 1836 and the latter in 1856. She leaves to survive her six children, four sons and two daughters, and one brother—Prothonotary Krickbaum. Her age was 45 oears and a few months. She occupied the old "Krickbaum" homestead and was well to do. She suffered long and much with no apparent relief, and death finally came a welcome visitor to end her bodily afflictions. Better to depart this life and be with God than to suffer its afflictions.

Curing by Faith.

THE RECENT REVIVAL OF A QUEER SUPERSTITION

The faith cure humbug has taken quite a boom lately. The rage for it broke out in the country, and our first notification of it came through despatches of its alleged marvels in the newspapers. It has now reached Brooklyn and found such favor that there are two opposition faith doctors healing humanity in that city. It is odd how this old superstition crops up from time to time. From the earliest period down there have always been, as there probably always will be, people who believe in the efficacy of faith as a means of cure.

It will be remembered that Dr. Johnson's mother took him to London when a boy to be "touched" by the King for the scrofula which afflicted him. She did this, as Johnson himself writes, by the advice of "the celebrated Sir John Slayer, then a physician in Tichfield," and the doctor adds that the touch was "without any effect."

This reminds one of the story that Sir Walter Scott's piper, John Bruce, spent a whole Sunday selecting twelve stones from twelve South-running streams, with the purpose that his lame master might sleep upon them and become whole. Scott was not the man to hurt the honest fellow's feeling by ridiculing the notion of such a remedy proving of avail; so he caused Bruce to be told that the recipe was infallible, but that it was absolutely necessary to success that the stones be wrapped up in the petticoat of a widow who had never wished to marry again; upon learning which the Highlander renounced all hope of completing the charm.

But the superstitions of which these two facts were born were in their decline at the time. Up to the end of the last century they were prevalent enough. In England, in the good old times, sovereigns fostered the belief, and the learned generally as well; the ignorant accepted it without investigation. It was practiced by nearly all the English kings up to the time of George I, who wisely discountenaced it, and finally abolished it in 1714. The superstition reached its culmination in the reign of Charles II, when, in the space of fourteen years, more than 92,000 persons sought relief from the touch of the royal hand, and, if we may believe Dr. Wiseman, the king's physician, they were nearly all cured.

In 1686 James II advertised in the London Gazette his intention of touching the afflicted as follows: "His Majesty is graciously pleased to appoint to heal, weekly, for the evil, upon Friday, and hath commanded his physicians and chirurgeons to attend at the office appointed for that purpose in the Meuse, upon Thursdays, in the afternoon, to give out tickets."

Queene Anne announced her gracious pleasure to perform the miracle, through the same channel, March 12, 1712, and on the 30th of the same month publicly touched 200 persons.

Another Queen, Elizabeth, during her progresses in Gloucestershire, became so tired touching those who desired to be cured that she bluntly told the afflicted who were pressing on her that God only could relieve them from their complaints.

James I announced, by proclamation, that patients would not be permitted to approach the royal presence during the summer; and Charles I ordered that no one should apply to be healed who did not bring a proper certificate that he or she had never been touched before. This certificate was obtained from medical officers specially appointed for this purpose, whose duty it was to make personal examination of all presenting themselves for relief, and to keep a record of cases submitted to the royal touch. This was rendered necessary as a measure of precaution for the sovereign, so great were the throngs that besieged the royal presence on these occasions.

English historians generally assert that Edward, the last of the Saxon line of kings, was the first to practice the gift in England. The practice seems to have originated in France, however, or at least was known there, away back in the time of Clovis I, whose reign began A. D. 481. A manuscript in the Sloane Collection in the British Museum affirms that "God gave Clovis (A. D. 496) the gift of curing the King's evil, and he proved it on Lancier, or Lanciet, his favorite."

Other records assert that Louis I (814–840) originally received the pow from divine sources. The true inwardness of the touching business seems to be limited by the fact that each person touched used, also, to receive a present of money. In England the gold angel, worth in Elizabeth's time ten shillings, and now a couple of pounds, was the regulation present, and sometimes smaller "healing pieces," as they were called, were given. Silver was also, though unfrequently, used.

Gemelli, the Italian traveler, was in Paris, on Easter Sunday, when 1600 persons were touched by Louis XIV. He says the words used were, Le roy te touche, Dieu te guerisse. Each Frenchman was given fifteen sous after being touched, but each foreigner received thirty sous. Even this small sum attracted imposters, for the King said to some: "Are you sick, too?" implying that he doubted them. Butler affirms that the French kings performed the cure only on days when they had received the holy communion; and Philip de Comines says they always confessed beforehand Mezeray records that St. Louis added to the ceremonial the sign of the cross, but other authorites ascribe it to Louis I.

The coin, which was attached to a string or ribbon, and hung about the patient's neck, seems to have contributed much to the permanent efficacy of the touch, for it was necessary to wear it during life. Moncony, the French traveler, relates that, when he was in England, Sir Kenelm Digby told him that if the person cured lost the piece of gold, the complaint returned at once.

Fabian Philips says that the gold angels issued on these occasions by the kings of England amounted to an annual charge of £3000.

It may be remembered that Shakespeare alludes to the custom in the third scene of the fourth act of "Macbeth," in these picturesque terms:

Malcom—Comes the king forth, I pray you?

Doctor—Ay, sir; there are a crew of wretched souls
That stay his cure; their malady convinces
The great assay of art; but, at his touch,
Such sanctity hath Heaven given his hand,
They presently amend.

The ceremonies atteding the royal exercese of the gift of healing were solemn and impressive. The patient was introduced into the presence by a bishop or a priest, by whom an introductory prayer was said. At its conclusion the King laid his hands upon the afflicted one, with these words: "I touch, but God healeth;" after which he hung the gold angel about his neck. The "Lord's Prayer was then said, and a prayer in behalf of the diseased person finished the "cure." Aubrey thinks that the King was not present at the prayers.

Cardinal Manning.

The frontispiece of the May Century is an effective portrait of Cardinal Manning, which illustrates a sketch of his life and character, by C. Keegan Paul, the author of the recent Century article on Cardinal Newman. Of Cardinal Manning he says in part:

Cardinal Manning is in his seventy-fourth year. He is the son of the late William Manning, M. P. and Governor of the Bank of England, and was educated at Harrow and Baliol, migrating thence, after taking the highest honors, to become a Fellow of Merton. He is a typical public school man, and could scarcely have been at any but a fashionable public school. Men who have not had such training may have courtly manners, may be thorough men of the world; those educated at home may have equal, sometimes more, erudition; but the combination of learning worn lightly like a flower, great frankness of manner with power of reticence when needed, aptness for being at home in any society, from the rough to the courtier, and simply unconscious ease, are generally to be found among Englishmen only in those educated at our first-class public schools These were the qualities which, joined with his birth and his father's position, gave him, even as a very young man, a commanding influence in Oxford society, which raised him to Archdeacon of Chichester at the early age of thirty-two, and which have made him so great a power in his own communion since he joined it. They have also given him influence among various classes of society especially among the great, so that his brother-in-law, the late Bishop of Winchester, smarting under the desertion of his friend and unable to deny himself the use of epigram, called him the "apostle of the feels." He became Rector of Lavington and Graffham in Sussex in 1834, and married the youngest Miss Sergeant, one of the co-heiresses of the Lavington property, two other sisters having married Samuel Wilberforce, afterward Bishop and Henry Wilberforce, his brother. Mrs. Manning survived her marriage but a few months. When the spiritual grace of baptism was denied by Mr. Gorham, and his view pronounced to be tenable with the Church of England. Archdeacon Manning, with many others, felt the very ground on which they stood cut from under them. If the Church of England denied sacramental grace, which to them involved the very essence of religion, there was indeed nowhere to turn but to the Church of Rome; however impossible it had once seemed that they should do so. Immediately after the Gorham judgment was pronunced. Archdeacon Manning shook from his feet the dust of an heretical Church, to join that toward which his steps had so long unconsciously been advancing; when no doubt he found that the boundaries were by no means so difficult to overstep as they had seemed to him on that November day. After the short retirement, inevitable on his change, preparatory to taking orders in the church of his adoption, his rise was rapid and signal. He, too, like his brother cardinal, founded a congregation, that of the Oblates of St. Charles Borromeo, filling in the interim the dignified office of Provost of Westminster. In 1865, Monsignor Manning was consecrated Archbishop of Westminster. In 1875, he was created a cardinal with the title of Saints Andrew and Gregory. Since his appointmeut as archbishop few men have ever been more before the world. Not only is he a constant-preacher in and a frequent preacher out of his diocese; not only has he been a combatant in intellecual contests, especially in the Metaphysical Society, a club which met monthly, where he held his own with such disputants as Dr. Martineau, Mr. Frederick Harrison, and Professor Huxley,—he has also taken part in the social life of London to such an extent that there is hardly philanthropic work in which he could consistently cooperate wherein he has not been a sharer. Conspicuous above all has been the aid that he has given to total abstinence societies both in and out of his church. In politics he is understood to take a strongly democratic view and has been heard to say that, were he not what he is, his choice would be to be a demagogue. On the Irish question, and to some extent on the Irish side, he is very outspoken; and should it hereafter prove to be possible that the Catholic Church, at least in the West, should ally herself with the cause of the people, of distinguished from the cause of the oligarchs, Cardinal Manning's name will be found on the roll of those who have helped the fusion.

A Churchly Innovation.

ADOPTION BY A METHODIST CONGREGATION OF A RITUALISTIC SERVICE.

Baltimore, Md., April 29.—There is considerable talk in Methodist church circles of this city over a new departure made by Mt. Vernon Church, the most fashionable and wealthiest Methodist congregation of Baltimore. This is the church of which Rev. Thomas Guard was pastor at the time of his death. Rev. Dr. Felton, formerly of St. Louis is his successor, and he has led the new movement, which has resulted in the introduction of a ritual somewhat on the Episcopalian order. The ritual was used for the first time at the service to-day, and little else was talked about by the congregation. It includes the chant of the Gloria Patria Psalter and the recital by the congreation of the Apostle's Creed.

Although printed cards were placed in the pews giving the order of service, yet there were some slight hitches, and at one point the pastor was obliged to ask the congregation to rise to continue the service. Dr. Eelton spoke of the objection to the ritual which had been made by some, and said that if, after a fair trial, it did not prove satisfactory, it would be discarded. It has been unanimously adopted by the board of trustees of the church, but some of the members object to it, while many of the old-time Methodists of other churches have protested against as it a step toward Episcopalianism. One of the Methodist Church papers here have condemned it in plain terms. The ritual, however, is authorized by the book of discipline, and it is used by several Methodists churches in other large cities.

A Doctor of Divinity's Hen Hunt.

One of the leading professors in Oxford hates to have the subject of hens mentioned in his presence—especially black hens; and the reason of it is this: It was on a fine Sunday afternoon in summer, a good many years ago, that the professor in question—who is the doctor of divinity, and who even then was one of the best known figures in the university, enjoying a reputation for prodigious erudition—was sunning himself in the High street. Now High street in Oxford on a fine Sunday afternoon toward the end of the summer term, when the town is filled with visitors who have come up to see Commemoration, is one of the most crowded and fashionable thoroughfares to be found in all England; and as the doctor threaded his way through the well dressed throng his dignified air bespoke a consciousnes of uncommon merit, ands merit not unrecognized by the world, while his face shone with a mixture of pride and benevolence such as become so great a man in so goodly a company. It so chanced, however, that a rampant gust of wind—which Æolus ought never to have allowed to roam about on such a sunny day—came romping up the street, stirring up swirls of dust and fluttering the ladies' ribbons as it came; and, whether it was the conspicuous gloss npon the professor's hat that caught the wind's eye (for the wind has an eye, or how could the mariners sail in it?), or, whether it was the baldness of the professor's head made his hat slide off more easily, is uncertain, but certain it is that his was the only hat that blew off in all the crowd.

Naturally the professor went off after his hat; but every one knows what a lot of trouble Mr. Pickwick had to catch his hat when it blew off, and with all his erudition, the professor was not unlike Mr. Pickwick in figure; so, instead of his having caught his hat, the latter obtained a commanding lead before it blew bump against the gate post of a stable yard. Now was the professor's opportunity, for the hat was lying dead beat up against the gate. But it also chanced that a solitary hen—a black one—was taking an afternoon stroll just inside the yard, and, with that perversity which has caused black hens to be regarded by the superstitious of all ages as birds of evil omen, was so frightened by the noise the hat made knocking against the wooden gate that she scuttled out into the street. As soon as she got in the street, the confusion at finding herself among so many people sent her in a flurry of dust and feathers—for hens always run the wrong way—out into the road, Once in the road, she met the professor, and immediately concluding (in spite of his clerical attire) that he was there to hunt her, away she went down the road in front of him. Nor was her surmise as to his intentions so ill-founded as is common with the panics of hens, for the Professor is terribly short-sighted, and what with the dust and the heat and the excitement of the chase he never detected the fraud that was being palmed off upon him, but started off after the hen as blithely as he had heretofore hunted his hat; though a hat is hard to catch a hen is worse: and any healthy fowl nomine digna can easily outrun a Doctor of Divinity So down the High street, with the stately throng of fashionable folks all agape on either hand, went this worse than Gilpin race; and while the hen kicked up the dust and the professor's bald head went flashing in the sun, and the under graduates bent out of their windows on each side of the road and cheered pursuer and pursued, and laid long odds upon the hen. And in all probability the professor would have hunted that hen till sundown had not a carriage come up the road to meet them, when to his horror he saw his hat—his well-behaved clerical hat, that had sat quietly on his head every Sunday for the last two months—take wings and fly clucking over the crowded sidewalk to settle on a wall. And to this day the professor hates the man who talks to him of hens.

Scenes from Life.

Boston Transtript.

"Clara, dearest," began Mark Frankton, "often has the question which I am about to ask you, trembled upon my lips."

"What is it, Mark?" exclaimed Clara, a feeling of undefined terror taking possession of her as she gazed into his unblanched face.

"Clara," continued Mark, taking her hand in his, and fondling it in a reassuring manner; "Clara, I love you—pray, don't be alarmed—I would have you with me always; that is to say, will you be mine?"

"And do you love me truly and disinterestedly, Mark?"

"Yes, Clara, as the world goes. I would be happy, and I believe you are the woman who will make me happy.

"But this is so sudden. Mark," murmured Clara, bending her head to hide her blushes.

"I know it is sudden. I didn't think of it myself till a day or two ago. But the fact is, I have come to the conclusion that I might as well get married. I want somebody to keep house for me, and do my washing, ironing and mending. I won't say that you are the only girl I ever loved, but as you appear to think a good deal of me, it is natural that I should think a good deal of you."

"Yes, Mark."

And I don't suppose it will cost much more, if it does, you know, you will be so glad to take in washing or something of that sort, to eke out our income."

"O, Mark! you know I love you, and I cannot resist your eloquent appeal. Yes, I will be yours forever."

"Very kind of you, Clara; really I am obliged to you. You have saved me a great deal of trouble. If you had refused me, I should have been obliged to ask some other girl. I had half a dozen in mind, but now that it is settled, I shan't bother to call on any of them."

"You don't know how happy I am to hear you speak thus, dear Mark. It shall be my aim to watch over your happpiness day and night. Henceforth I live only for you."

"Yes, Clara, that's what I want. Now that we have settled the question, I'll be going, as I promised Tom Badger I'd come over and play a game of pool with him this eevening. Good night."

"Good night, Mark."

A bridge across the Firth-of Forth is projected, and indeed is already under way, which, if finished, will be one of the most remarkable bridges in the world. The main girder will be within a few feet of of a mile in length and will rest upon round cylindrical piers, each of which will weigh 16,000 tons. It will of course be high enough for all vessels to pass underneath and about 42,000 tons of steel will be requird in its contsruction. The estimated cost will be $7,500,000.

Vital Questions!!

Ask the most eminent physician
Of any school, what is the best thing in the world for quieting and allaying all irritation of the nerves and curing all forms of nervous complaints, giving natural, child-like refreshing sleep always?
And they will tell you unhesitatingly
"Some form of Hops!"

CHAPTER I

Ask any or all of the most eminent physicians:
"What is the best and only remedy that can be relied on to cure all diseases of the kidneys and urinary organs;such as Bright's disease, diabetes, retention or inability to retain urine, and all the diseases and ailments peculiar to women"—
"And they will tell you explicitly and emphatically "Buchu."
Ask the same physicians
"What is the most reliable and surest cure for all liver diseases or dyspepsia, constipation, indigestion, biliousness, malarial fever, ague, &c.," and they will tell you:
"Mandrake! or Dandelion!"
Hence, when these remedies are combined with others equally valuable
And compounded into Hop Bitters, such a wonderful and mysterious curative power is developed which is so varied in its operations that no disease or ill heath can possibly exist or resist its power, and yet it is Harmless for the most frail woman, weakest invalid or smallest child to use.

CHAPTER II

How? By getting one bottle of BROWN' IRON BITTERS, and taking it regularly according to directions.

Mansfield, Ohio, Nov. 26, 1881.
Gentlemen:—I have suffered with pain in my side and back, and great soreness on my breast, with shooting pains all through my body, attended with great weakness, depression of spirits, and loss of appetite. I have taken several different medicines, and was treated by prominent physicians for my liver, kidneys, and spleen, but I got no relief. I thought I would try Brown's Iron Bitters; I have now taken one bottle and a half and am about well—pain in side and back all gone—soreness all out of my breast, and I have a good appetite, and am gaining in strength and flesh. It can justly be called the king of medicines.
